Papal Rome and the European Union

By

Richard Bennett
&
Michael de Semlyen

The Vatican has long been the most powerful institution in Europe. Despite the decline of its influence at the time of the Reformation, it has made a significant recovery of power during these past two centuries. The Protestant nations of Europe that were religiously, politically and economically once freed from a totalitarian Roman Church seem now to be blindly returning to her yoke.

This general lack of public awareness is particularly noticeable with regard to the influential role the Vatican has long been maintaining in connection with the development of the EU.

If, however, the nations of Europe are to remain free, then it is vitally important that true believers on both sides of the Atlantic now wake up, to and then tackle, the critical issue of Rome and the EU, whilst also taking it to Almighty GOD in prayer. The alternative- that of inaction may well result in the re-institution of the Inquisition under Corpus Juris.

It is the desire of the authors that their study of one of the most powerful institutions in today's world be now carefully examined. Our purpose is, thereby, both to sound the alarm and stimulate others to do the same.
